To the East includes a selection of established and emerging contemporary artists with ties to eastern North Carolina. By combining media, textures, and artistic styles, To the East aims to bring a little bit of the east right here to Raleigh. This selection, organized by Ben Knight, includes Knight's own vibrant abstracts, the bold metal sculptures of Jordan Parah and Brandon McCullar, and the textured acrylic works of Kinston's Joseph Hood, among others. The opening reception is Friday, February from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m.

Toy Boom! Toys from the 1950s and '60s

The Baby Boomer era was a time of great abundance for middle-class America. Economic prosperity was at an all-time high, and the influx of television helped propel a new middle-class into a consumer-driven society. Additionally, a soaring birthrate made the country a child-focused culture. These children, however, grew up in a time of great dramatic change, and parents were caught between a familiar past and a complex future. Toys would help children find their correct place in society, or so parents wanted to believe. These toys reflected the energy, ambition, and abundance of a prosperous era, but they also channeled the uncertainties of the period.
